

- 86 What the French presidential election bodes for Europe's future
What will happen to the EU should Marine Le Pen be elected President? How will Russia and Turkey react? This French presidential election may become an important historical turning point that decides the fate of not just the EU, but Europe as a whole.
Bill Emmott (Journalist)
- 92 "After Syria": Battle for supremacy intensifies in the Middle East
Once the situation in Syria quiets down, the conflict between the two regional major powers, Saudi Arabia and Iran, will likely come to the fore. There are no prospects for a stable region with the decreased presence of the U.S.
Keiko Sakai (Chiba University)
- 101 Japan-ROK relationship has entered a new stage
The ratification of the impeachment proposal of President Park Geun-hye has marked the beginning of a period of political movement with an eye on the presidential election in ROK politics. This essay analyzes the structural factors behind the political turmoil in ROK and thinks about what kind of mutual understandings could help heighten Japan-ROK relationship to a new level.
Junya Nishino (Keio University)
- 110 "Season of politics" will come in China: Xi Jinping's power base and challenges
Xi Jinping administration will enter its second term with a strong hold on power within his administration. While maintaining the one-party rule of the Chinese Communist Party, it seeks to restore its humiliating history of the past to its rightful place, but the slowdown of economic development and building relationship with the Trump administration stands in its way as challenges.
Masahiro Okoshi (Nikkei)
- 116 India's Modi administration's diplomatic strategy to increase wealth and military power
India has initiated its "India first" diplomacy, which rides on a smooth economic development, positions itself as a major power, and asserts its presence. Are there any blind spots to this policy, especially in terms of its relationship with the U.S.?
Takenori Horimoto (Gifu Women's University)
- 121 Paris Agreement framework will move forward despite U.S. absence
If the Trump administration opts to exit from the Paris Agreement, how should the world respond to climate change? What we need now is a full-scale operation of the Paris Agreement that pulls the world towards a cataclysmic change in energy policies.
Yukari Takamura (Nagoya University)
- 128 Reports from the World Assembly for Women: WAW! 2016
Work-life balance and international aid: Let's think about a new type of aid by thinking about our own problems at home
The potential for life-work balance is significant, but we can't say that this concept has seeped into the Japanese society well enough. The keys to giving foreign aid while dealing with challenges at home are "understanding and respect."
Renge Jibu (Journalist)
- 134 Japan should take a global leadership role through women's entry in the workforce
Arancha González (International Trade Centre)

Year 2017 - Where the world is headed and how Japan should navigate

- 6 Cover Story Interview
Outlook of 2017: the year of change
Fumio Kishida (Minister for Foreign Affairs)
- 16 A first step towards “the land of Japan-Russia cooperation”: Achievements and challenges of the Japan-Russia Summit Meeting
A sense of disappointment prevailed within Japan over the Japan-Russia Summit Meeting, due to high expectations. However, one can argue that Japan-Russia relationship has undergone a new development when looking closely at the process of negotiations. How will the Japan-Russia negotiation turn out in the future?
Akiko Iwata (NHK)
- 24 How Putin’s visit to Japan looks from Russia
How can Putin’s visit to Japan be assessed from the Russian perspective? This essay looks at the future of Japan-Russia relations by considering factors such as the Putin administration’s “Asia shift” and the beginning of Trump administration in the United States.
Nobuo Shimotomai (Hosei University)
- 32 Prime Minister Abe’s Pearl Harbor visit: Current state of historical reconciliation between Japan and the U.S.
Following President Obama’s visit to Hiroshima in May 2016, Prime Minister Abe will visit Pearl Harbor from December 26 to 27. The author explains the significance of historical reconciliation between Japan and the U.S. and the problem of historical perception and historical reconciliation in general.
Jennifer Lind (Dartmouth College)
- 45 Introduction to key Cabinet members and staffs of the Trump administration
Masahiko Adachi (Sumitomo Corporation Global Research)
- 50 Uncoordinated diplomatic strategy: Burgeoning conflicts within the Trump team
Trump administration’s core cabinet members and White House Staff have mostly been decided. Statements made by those appointed to deal with foreign and security policy differ in many ways from what Donald Trump has stated thus far. Will the policy coordination process eliminate or expand these seeds of conflict?
Richard McGregor (Journalist)
- 57 Increasing uncertainty in U.S.-China relations: The direction of China’s maritime expansion and the Taiwan problem
The state of affairs in East Asia continues its flux after the electoral triumph of Donald Trump. Japan’s role is crucial given the opaqueness of future U.S.-China relations. The author argues that tireless adjustment of Japan-U.S. alliance in order to hedge China’s maritime expansion and engagement policy for confidence building are both indispensable policies of Japanese diplomacy.
Yasuhiro Matsuda (University of Tokyo)
- 64 Trade policy framework of the Post-TPP era: Challenges of multilateral trade in a world without the U.S.
“The job-killing Trans-Pacific Partnership.” The trade policy becoming a contentious campaign issue led to the birth of Trump administration. Will the U.S. trade policies become protectionist and if so, how should disputes be settled? The author considers the direction of world trade after the collapse of TPP.
Yoshiko Kojo (University of Tokyo)
- 69 The impact of new Trump administration’s economic policies and its risks
High stock prices continue from anticipated expectations, but the actual contents of Trump’s economic policies remain to be unseen. This essay lays out what we should look out for in the coming “Trumpnomics” from the information we have now and future forecast, including whether it could pay close attention to both economic impact and policy impact or not.
Masahiko Hashimoto (New York Research Center, Daiwa Institute of Research)